

Cold enquiries. Ghost clients.

Here's how to fix both
in your service business

ENQUIRY

BOOKED CLIENT

RETURNING CLIENT

Recover more bookings from the leads and clients you already have

Why this happens.

Cold enquiries and ghost clients are usually a follow-up problem, not a demand problem.

1. Enquiries come in

People show interest, then go quiet.

2. Follow-up is inconsistent

Replies and reminders depend on memory.

3. Clients leave without a return path

No rebooking or win-back system brings them back.

No system = silent revenue leaks

Fix cold enquiries first.

When someone shows interest, speed and simplicity matter.

1 Respond quickly

A fast first reply keeps intent alive.

2 Make booking easy

One clear next step beats back-and-forth.

3 Follow up until they decide

Most leads need reminders, not pressure.

Good leads go cold when the next step is unclear.

Use a simple follow-up flow.

A basic sequence can recover enquiries before they go cold.

Automation protects good leads from being forgotten.

Ghost clients need rebooking.

Bring clients back before they drift away.

After the visit

Send a thank-you and the next step.

When they are due back

Remind them at the right time.

Make returning easy

Give them one clear way to rebook.

If clients must remember by themselves, many will not.

Then add a win-back flow.

For clients who have already gone quiet.

1 Check in

Ask if they still need help or want to come back.

2 Give a reason to return

Use timing, relevance, or an offer.

3 Make replying easy

Use a quick reply or direct booking link.

Reactivating past clients is often cheaper than buying new attention.

Stop chasing. Start systemising.

The shift that fixes both cold enquiries and ghost clients.

CHASING

Staff memory

Random follow-up

Inconsistent rebooking

Leads get lost

SYSTEM

Triggered automations

Consistent messaging

Due-back reminders

Clear recovery path

Systems recover revenue more reliably than good intentions.
